Madison and Jefferson were born into very different worlds. Madison was born into a wealthy Virginia family, while Jefferson was born into a more modest family in the same state. Despite their different backgrounds, they both developed a passion for politics at a young age. They met in the Continental Congress in 1776, and they quickly became close friends. They shared a love of liberty and a commitment to the principles of the Enlightenment. They also shared a deep respect for each other's intellect and abilities.

Madison and Jefferson worked together on many important projects during the Revolution. They were both members of the Committee of Five that drafted the Declaration of Independence. They also worked together on the Articles of Confederation, the first constitution of the United States. After the war, Madison and Jefferson continued to be active in politics. Madison served as the fourth president of the United States, and Jefferson served as the third president. They remained close friends throughout their lives, and they continued to exchange letters and ideas until Jefferson's death in 1826.

The friendship between Madison and Jefferson was a remarkable one. It was a friendship that was based on mutual respect, admiration, and affection. It was a friendship that helped to shape the course of American history. This book tells the story of that friendship, and it is a story that is well worth reading.

Andrew Burstein is a professor of history at the University of California, Los Angeles. He is the author of several books on American history, including Jefferson's Secrets: Death and Desire at Monticello and The Passions of Andrew Jackson.
